Iceland

The constitution recognizes only a municipal level of self-government and the capital city Reykjavik does not have a special status (C 1944, Art. 78; Council of Europe: Iceland 1998, 2006, 2010, 2018). Iceland has an intermediate level of governance, the eight landshlutasmót (regions) created for statistical purposes. The average population of the regions is about 35,000. Until 1988, Iceland had twenty-three sýslur (counties), which were responsible for inter-municipal cooperation (Harloff 1987). Local authorities may establish regional associations (Council of Europe: Iceland 2006, 2013; Law No. 45/1998, Arts. 81–86), and to date, eight exist. Their boundaries follow for the most part the old electoral districts. Regional associations (or federations) may run services on behalf of the local authorities such as refuse disposal or schooling. All local authorities belong to the Íslandsbundin í samviði sveitarfélaganna, which is a regular negotiation partner with the central government on behalf of the local authorities. In addition, Iceland is divided into task-specific districts for health, sanitary inspection, or tax collection (Council of Europe: Iceland 1998).

Primary references

Secondary references

Humes, Samuel, and Eileen Martin. 1969. The Structure of Local Government. A Comparative

1 Samband Islenskra Sveitarfélaga. Sambandid. “Íslandsbundin í samviði sveitarfélaganna” and “Regional Association” <http://www.samband.is/um-okkur>.

@Version, February 2021 – author: Arjan H. Schakel